Coming in person? Simply arrive a few minutes early.

Saturday mornings at RIM are a place to slow down, sit together, and listen.

Each gathering pairs guided meditation with a Dharma talk—a teaching drawn from Buddhist wisdom and brought into the real questions of how we live, how we relate, and how we meet difficulty with steadiness and care.

You may come because life feels overwhelming, because you want to develop a regular practice, or because meditation apps no longer feel like enough. You do not need to arrive calm, spiritually certain, or prepared to speak. You may simply take a seat and begin where you are.

This is RIM’s longest-running weekly gathering. Some people attend every Saturday; others come occasionally. Both are complete ways to participate.

WHAT THE MORNING HOLDS

A simple, supportive rhythm.

01

Arrive and settle

There is time to find a chair or cushion and let the pace of the morning soften.

02

Guided meditation

Clear, accessible instructions support beginners while leaving room for experienced practitioners.

03

Dharma teaching

A traditional teaching is translated into the ordinary territory of work, relationships, loss, habit, and care.

Optional conversation

You may ask a question, share a reflection, or simply listen. Speaking is never required.

FACILITATOR

Jesse Foy

Jesse is RIM's founder and guiding teacher. His teaching brings traditional Buddhist psychology and contemporary mindfulness approaches into language that is practical, humane, and relevant to everyday life.
